

Acknowledgements

“God keep me from ever completing anything. This whole book is but a draught – nay, but a draught of a draught. Oh, Time, Strength, Cash, and Patience.”
(Herman Melville, Moby Dick)

Reading countless pages of acknowledgements in countless books, I never realized how difficult a task it would be to say “thank you” for all the help, support, understanding, grief and argument given by so many people over the time it took to write this dissertation. There can be no overstating the contributions of so many people, so my fear is of sinning by omission or under-representation. Simply and tritely put, I could not have done it on my own; it took a large and disparate community to help me through this project. But the mistakes are mine alone.

First and foremost I wish to thank my wife, Hiên, who has stood by me through all my travails, my absences, my fits of pique and impatience. She gave me support and help, discussed ideas and prevented several wrong turns. She also supported the family during much of my graduate studies. Along with her, I want to acknowledge my two sons, Ian and Bảo-Ân. They have never known their dad as anything but a student, it seems. Good boys, both, and great sources of love and relief from scholarly endeavor. In fact, all my family have been steadfast and supportive. My siblings and their families, my parents-in-law and brothers-in-law, and the vast extended family from both my side and my wife’s side have all been wonderful – and very patient.

Next I would like to thank my committee, Lucy Jarosz, Victoria Lawson, Steve Herbert, and Christoph Giebel. They always knew when to encourage or kick butt, as I needed. Lucy particularly spent a great deal of time helping me through the intellectual and bureaucratic processes and became a close friend.

I also wish to thank Dr. Michael Brown who sat on my General Exam committee and was a major influence on my intellectual development in my early days as a new graduate student. He once said, “The most subversive thing I do is teach.” His teaching was life-changing for me.

The entire Department of Geography at the University of Washington was a second home for more than seven years, and all of the faculty, staff and fellow graduate students provided a safe and dynamic place to study, argue and research. In particular, I wish to thank Dr. Tim Nyerges, who came through with TA-ships or other funding during particularly difficult moments, and who was always a supporting presence. Others, faculty and students, are too numerous to list, but rest assured you all have a place in my heart.

I cannot neglect to mention the Sara Van Fleet and staff Southeast Asia Center at the University of Washington. They have helped me through a number of issues, provided a greatly appreciated community of scholars, and made graduate school a richer experience. Thank you!

Of course, none of this research could have been done without the friendship and trust of my many informants in Vietnam. Most of these people must remain nameless in this document due to concern for their confidentiality. I cannot express how open and honest all of my informants were, even knowing that the information they provided could easily be misconstrued or could get them into difficulties. I hope I have lived up to their trust while trying to explain a bit of their circumstances.

My research was greatly facilitated by my formal relationship with the University of Social Science and Humanities in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam, organized through the Office for the Science Management and International Relations (Phòng Quản lý Khoa học và Quan hệ Quốc tế). I was assigned to work under two different research centers there, the Center for Research in Social Development and Poverty Reduction (Trung tâm Nghiên cứu Phát triển Xã hội và Giảm nghèo) and the Center for Research in Urban and Community Development (Trung tâm Nghiên cứu Phát triển Đô thị và Cộng đồng). These relationships provided me with the official credentials I needed to undertake my research in Vietnam, but also with places to discuss some of my ideas, get feedback, and develop friendships. I was also warmly received by the Department of Geography at the University of Social Sciences and Humanities, where I gave several talks and made several friends.

During my fieldwork and after, I was fortunate to have the support and encouragement of a number of Western scholars in Vietnam Studies and fields related to civil society. Some bought me lunch in Ho Chi Minh City and talked of political theory, some responded to my initial ideas with their own musings on Vietnamese society or how civil society can be interpreted in the Third World. Chief among these scholars who served as informal mentors are Dr. Joerg Wischermann, Dr. Mark Sidel, and Dr. Irene Norlund, all experts on various aspects of Vietnamese politics and society. These three have welcomed me as a colleague and encouraged my work from the very beginning – something that any PhD student values highly.

Many staff of international agencies in Vietnam became interested in my work and in my ideas. Several of these contributed greatly to my understanding of INGOs, VNGOs, and development in Vietnam. In particular I would like to thank Katrine Pedersen, Trine Glue and Soren Davidsen, whom (with Dr. Norlund mentioned above) I refer to as my “Danish Mafia” on civil society issues in Vietnam.

Last but not least, I would like to thank my many and varied funders for their support. It takes money to conduct research, especially when the researcher is also part of a growing family. Here is a list of the funders who made this work possible:

Blakemore Freeman Fellowship for Advanced Asian Language Study for pre-research language study in Vietnam

U.S. Fulbright Student Fellowship, covering the bulk of my research in Vietnam

University of Washington Graduate School, Chester-Fritz Grant for International Studies

University of Washington, Southeast Asia Consortium/Ford Foundation Small Research Grant

University of Washington Department of Geography Howard Martin/Friends of Geography Grant for travel and for research support

Graduate School Fund for Excellence and Innovation Travel Award

Research Grant for Nonprofits & Philanthropy in support of writing the dissertation

Saigon South International School, whose generous scholarship allowed my son to attend their school while I was conducting fieldwork

This list of acknowledgements can only capture a small fraction of the people who supported my work. I send my deep thanks to all. Your contributions to this dissertation were vital, but the inevitable mistakes in it are very much my own.
