ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This dissertation could not have been completed without the great support that I have received from so many people over the years. I wish to offer my most heartfelt thanks to the following people.

To my advisors, Alan Borning and John Bransford. Thank you for the advice, support, and willingness that allowed me to pursue research on topics for which I am truly passionate. I see the same drive and passion in your own research efforts, and I thank you for letting me do the same.

To my mentor, Sheryl Burgstahler. We first met during one of the more difficult times of my life, and you were there to talk and to offer guidance. Thank you for all of the meetings and chats over the years. You recognized that I at times needed to work alone but also made sure to check in on me so that I stayed on the right path.

To Lindsay Michimoto. As the department’s graduate advisor, you have been an ever present beacon of support, encouragement, and advice. Thank you for keeping your office door open and available for all the times when I needed it.

To Linda Shapiro. I had given up and was ready to quit graduate school when you came to me and offered help. I can honestly say that without your intervention, this dissertation would not exist. I am not the only student that you have helped prevent slip through the cracks, so thank you for being there for both me and all the others.

To Cindy Atman, Jim Borgford-Parnell, and all of the other people at CELT. Thank you for the opportunity to work as a graduate research assistant at CELT. Providing funding for the last several years of my studies was truly helpful, but I am far more grateful for and appreciative of the collaborations and conversations we have had. Thank you.

To Janet Davis. From the day I began graduate school, you have become one of my best friends. We have seen and helped each other through both good times and bad. I will always remember the great conversations we had over lunch, and I know that we will break bread together many more times.

To Ken Yasuhara. I have always been able to turn to you when I have needed a listening ear, a dissenting opinion, or someone to gauge the spiciness of some food. You are a great friend and a rock of stability in my life. You also helped bring Susie into my life, but our friendship was strong before and I hope it will continue to be as strong in the future.

To my Mom and Dad. You have encouraged my academic interests from day one, even when my curiosity led to incidents that were kind of hard to explain. Thank you.

To my brother, Jason. While I have taken my own directions at times, I have always appreciated the path that you have blazed before me. You may be the first Dr. Deibel, but you are now no longer the only one.

To Jen, Sharon, Grandma, and the rest of my family. Some of you I have known forever, while some of you have come into my life only recently. Regardless, thank you the ongoing encouragement over the years.

To my therapist, Bryant Vehrs. Our sessions have been about more than my mental health and improving my quality of life. You have been a guide and friend for me throughout graduate school, and this dissertation would truly have never been completed without your support. Thank you.

To Tim Wright and Sarah Read. We have collaborated on multidisciplinary research, discussed politics and philosophies, and shared more than a few pitchers of beer and plates of nachos. You have been two of my closest colleagues and closest friends in the last few years, and I look forward to the day that the beer and nachos are a toast for all of us having finished our PhD work.

To Kraig M. I will never forget my time working as your tutor at Literacy Source. I know you had struggled in school and felt stuck in learning, which is why I worked hard at finding and showing you your learning strengths. From that first moment you gained traction, you began moving forward and never stopped. Your drive and passion for learning will always remind me of why I teach.

To the SIGCSE community. I first joined this community as an uncertain graduate student, but I soon found so many willing to reach out and connect with me. The conversations, advice, friendships, and fun helped shape my development as a researcher and educator. There are too many of you to list here, but do know that I thank you and will honor the help you gave me by repeating the kindness to others as a member of the SIGCSE community.

To Dan Comden, Dyane Haynes, Dennis Lang, Michael Richardson, Jessie Shulman, Charity Ranger, and the other members of the UW disability community. As faculty, staff, or students, you were all involved in my ongoing learning about the social aspects of disability and disability advocacy. The broad, nuanced view of disability in dissertation is thanks to the great conversations we have shared over the years. Thank you.

To Anna Cavender, Shaun Kane, Kristen Shinohara, Jeff Bigham, Susumu Harada, and the other graduate students who did or are doing assistive technology work. In the last several years, I have seen a large and active assistive technology research group come into being at the university. Thank you for the community and the conversations. Continue doing the great work both at UW and wherever you go in life.
To the chemists Runge, Robiquet, Pelletier, and Caventou. Thank you for your pioneering work in isolating and characterizing the chemical properties of caffeine. The results of your work played an admittedly strong role throughout my time in graduate school.

To some of my favorite authors, Mary Roach, Oliver Sacks, and Simon Winchester. Your books have not only provided me with hours of reading pleasure, but your predilection for footnotes and endnotes has also carried over into my own writing.

To so many webcomics artists and authors. Thank you for the entertainment and joy you have and continue to bring to me.

To my study participants. While I have said the same for others in this list, it is literally true that this dissertation could not have been completed without your participation. Thank you.

To anyone that may I have forgotten. I apologize. Thank you as well.
